Assignment No. 1

Question

Your task is to:

- Identify (in second column) which school of thought is represented in each scenario.

Provide a clear justification (at least 3 points) (in third column) explaining how that perspective interprets the person’s condition. Make sure your justifications are short, written in simple language, and directly linked to the behaviors or feelings mentioned in each case.

Scenario	Identification	Justification
Hina, a 28-year-old teacher, often cries without knowing the reason. In therapy, she remembers feeling ignored and unloved by her parents during childhood. Her therapist thinks these old feelings are hidden in her mind and now appear as sadness and guilt.	Psychodynamic	Unconscious childhood memories, like feeling ignored by parents, can surface as unexplained emotions such as crying and guilt, according to this perspective. - Hidden feelings from early life influence current behavior, explaining why Hina's sadness seems to come from nowhere. - Therapy uncovers these buried experiences, showing how unresolved parental issues shape adult emotional responses like her ongoing guilt.
Hamza, a 27-year-old man, feels constant pressure to earn well and support his family. He believes that if he fails, others will see him as weak. This pressure makes him anxious and low in self-esteem.	Cognitive	Negative beliefs, like thinking failure means being seen as weak, distort his view of himself and lead to anxiety, as this perspective focuses on how thoughts affect emotions. - His constant pressure and low self-esteem stem from irrational assumptions about others' judgments, which cognitive theory sees as patterns that can be challenged and changed. - These thoughts prevent him from coping effectively, illustrating how mental interpretations of success and failure drive his anxious feelings and undermine his confidence.
Sara, a 30-year-old woman, keeps thinking, “I am useless and will never do anything right.” These thoughts make her feel hopeless and stop her from trying new things.	Cognitive	Repetitive negative thoughts, such as “I am useless,” create a cycle of hopelessness that blocks action, as this school emphasizes how distorted thinking patterns control behavior. Her belief that she “will never do anything right” reinforces feelings of despair, showing how self-defeating ideas directly limit her motivation and opportunities. - These mental habits prevent her from engaging in new activities, demonstrating how unhelpful cognitions maintain a state of inactivity and emotional distress.
Bilal, a 32-year-old man, has been feeling sad and tired for many months. His father also had depression, and doctors found that his brain chemicals are not balanced. He believes his low mood is due to something wrong inside his body.	Biological	Imbalanced brain chemicals directly cause his ongoing sadness and tiredness, as this perspective links mood disorders to physical factors like genetics or neurochemistry. - Family history, such as his father's depression, suggests a hereditary component that affects his brain function, explaining the persistent low mood. - His belief in a bodily issue aligns with how this school views mental health as rooted in biological imbalances, which can be treated through medical interventions like medication.
Ahsan, a 25-year-old student, stopped meeting friends after failing a test. Since then, no one praises or encourages him. His isolation makes him even sadder, and he now avoids all social activities.	Behavioral	His avoidance of friends after failing a test shows learned behavior, where negative experiences lead to withdrawal, as this perspective focuses on how actions are shaped by environmental responses. - The lack of praise or encouragement reinforces his isolation, illustrating how the absence of positive reinforcement maintains sad behaviors and social avoidance. - Over time, this pattern of isolating himself worsens his sadness, demonstrating how repeated behaviors, influenced by external factors, create a cycle of avoidance and emotional decline.
